An article role model for the next generation of English learners. In my opinion, the best option for a fictional character which would be dedicated with a statue is Guy Montag from the book "451° Fahrenheit" written by Ray Bradbury. It may sound ridiculous or unlogical to set a statue to a person who was a <sup>fire</sup> fireman and burnt books but now I am going to set the record straight and explain my choice. I opted for choosing this character to be honored with having a statue of himself, because he is a true thinking and representation of how rigidly person can develop himself by broadening his outlook despite the previous mistakes that were made. Moreover, Guy Montag was trying to change not only his own inner nature, but the whole society around him. He wanted to let other people which surrounded him to open their eyes and see how awful the world they live in is. If we get deeper into the details, we will notice that this character was careful and affectionate towards people who were turning against him.

Summing up these three reasons, including growing up as a person, an attempt to put a ding in the universe and change the whole world, being patient towards people who even did not deserve it, I think it is the best character who should be given with a statue. I imagine this sculpture to be 2 meters high and embody Guy Montag holding the whole world on his shoulders. It would be massive and bright statue to be able to have an eye from a majority of people.

Taking everything into consideration, I still strongly believe that Guy Montag should be a symbol of the next generation of English learners.
